"Breaking News! Professor and Archaeologist Alpaca Smith and his team of researchers from the University of London has discovered artifacts resembling artifacts from the fictional tales of Harry Potter by J. K. Rowling. Could Hogwarts exists after all?

After uncovering a wooden stick with ancient engravings of characters unlike any modern languages, the team of researchers took a x-ray scan of the ancient artifact and discovered that the wooden stick's core consists of a feather unlike any creatures in existence today.

Upon further research, it is confirmed by scholars around the world that this feather belongs to a Pterosaur, an ancient creature that existed during most of Mesozoic to the end of Cretaceous (228 to 66 million years ago)."

Could it be possible that perhaps Hogwarts isn't just a fantasy and that magical creature and supernatural abilities are real? Perhaps the mass extinction of the dinosaurs was actually caused a massive battle between wizards of the ancient world? If so, where does J. K. Rowling factors in all of this?

Title: Why was Hermione never affected by the Horcrux like Ron and Harry?

Font: Comic Sans ▾

I remember reading the Harry Potter series and noticing that both Harry and Ron were negatively affected by the Horcrux in a dramatic way. Hermione, however, seemed to be fine throughout the duration she had interaction with the Horcruxes.
